

Please do not do anything to diminish the current effectiveness of Indiana's law regarding telemarketers. Before contacting the Attorney General's office and being placed on the "do not call" list there, we were receiving three to four unwanted calls per evening. Invariably, they interrupted us at dinner or would call on Saturday mornings (our only morning to sleep in) and wake us up. We know what we want and need to buy and we know how to find those products and services. We do not need rude interruptions by telemarketers trying to sell us something that we do not want or need. We are the ones who pay for our phone service - I resent businesses that intrude on my privacy at my inconvenience and expense. I am very happy with the current law regarding telemarketing in Indiana and do not believe that the FCC needs to interfere with a very successful state law.
